Demand for butter is steady to lighter in the Central region this week, and some contacts suggest current butter prices may be contributing to lackluster spot interest. On the CME, butter prices have declined by 4 cents since last Wednesday. Cream has tightened somewhat compared to last week, and cream multiples are pushing upwards slightly in the region. However, contacts report volumes are more available than they typically are this time of year. Some butter makers are, reportedly, sourcing loads of cream from the West region. Butter makers are actively churning, though plant managers say production schedules remain below capacity. Spot loads of salted butter are available but are not excessive in the Central region.

Prices for: Central U.S., All First Sales, F.O.B., Grade AA, Conventional, and Edible Butter
