4. BACKGROUND

Employees are an agency’s greatest resource. Therefore, it is very important that any grievances they have relating to workplace issues or concerns are resolved as promptly as possible. Grievances, if handled appropriately, benefit the agency by providing employees an effective process to resolve their issues and concerns efficiently and fairly. They also promote a better understanding of agency policies, directives, regulations, and procedures.

5. POLICY

a. It is MRP policy that no action will be taken against, or benefit withheld from, employees or their representatives as reprisal for filing or considering the filing of a grievance. Reprisal, intimidation, coercion, restraint, or discrimination because of grievance activity or contemplated grievance activity is a prohibited personnel practice. Those engaging in such practices are subject to disciplinary action. Employees who provide information concerning grievance issues will be free from reprisal, intimidation, coercion, restraint, or discrimination.

b. Employees and supervisors will have a choice to engage in an alternative dispute resolution process such as mediation or facilitation at the initial grievance stage. In some instances, such processes may also be allowed at subsequent stages of the grievance process.

c. The AGS is designed to foster better communication and understanding between employees and their supervisors, resulting in prompt resolutions. Accordingly, informal grievances will be initially filed with an employee’s first line supervisor.

6. OPERATING GUIDELINES

a. Specific information regarding the Administrative Grievance System procedures may be found in the Human Resources Desk Guide (HRDG), Subchapter 4771, Administrative Grievance System.
